About Food Bloggers for Slave Free Tomatoes (FBSFT)

On Tuesday, July 24, 2012, food bloggers from around the country will donate their posts to the fight for slave-free tomatoes. Participants have been asked to post a recipe using slave-free tomatoes, and most importantly, prompt readers to take action by sending letters to the CEOs of major supermarket chains Ahold, Publix, and Kroger, asking them to endorse the Fair Food Program.

The event was created by Nicole Gulotta, founder of The Giving Table, as a philanthropic response to Recipe for Change. Recipe for Change is the summer campaign led by International Justice Mission in partnership with The Coalition of Immokalee Workers and The Fair Food Standards Council to raise awareness about slavery and injustices in U.S. tomato farms.

About The Giving Table | Doing good with food.

The mission of The Giving Table is to empower everyone to become a food philanthropist.

Since cooking in our own kitchen is just the start of our engagement with the food community, think of The Giving Table as an extension of your dining room. More than ever, consumers recognize that their choices make a difference and are demanding that the food system become sustainable, equitable, and accountable to its community and our environment. The Giving Table makes it easy to be part of the movement and stay informed about all things food including hunger, sustainable farming, healthy eating, policy and the nonprofit organizations that are making a difference every day.

Nicole Gulotta | Founder, The Giving Table

For many years, Nicole has described herself as a philanthropist by day and gourmet home cook by night. Nicole studied literature at the University of California, Santa Barbara and received an MFA from Vermont College of Fine Arts. In 2008, she started the food blog Cooking After Five and wrote it for almost four years before launching Eat This Poem. Nicole lives in Los Angeles where she works at a private family foundation.
